Eighteen regions across the state are represented by regional directors who will work closely with local community groups in each region, and the local PTAs to coordinate efforts in promoting drug-free youth through a state-wide network.

Nina Palmer, Olympus Community Council on Youth, was elected interim president of the newly formed federation, and said, "The purpose of the parent involvement in drug and alcohol prevention is that we simply do not have enough professionals to take care of the problem. Parents are going to have to learn how to help prevent drug and alcohol abuse. This movement needs to involve the entire community."

Some of the organization's goals are to help communities organize anti-drug and alcohol abuse chapters, promote a parenting skills class on how to develop capable young people with the skills needed to avoid substance abuse, to start a state-wide newsletter, to establish and operate a drug information center, to educate the public with respect to illegal drugs and the medical effects of such use, to present an educational program to community organizations and develop a speakers bureau, and to coordinate efforts with other public and private health organizations.

Anyone interested in joining to help our youth live drug-free lives can call Beverly Prince, 654-0437.

"Many teachers could offer more instructional advantages to their students if classes were smaller," said UEA President Betty Condie.

She said many classes require students' understanding of complicated concepts, and this calls for a lot of communication between the teacher and students.

"Larger classes permit less communication," Mrs. Condie

The UEA points out that the goal is to reduce the number of students in classrooms to an average of 25.
